> The skyscrapers of lower Manhattan shook like houses of reed. The heavens for half an hour were lighted by a great stream of fire, which rolled now high, now low. Sparks showered down in the immediate vicinity of the disaster for fully five minutes.

> The explosion occurred on Black Tom, a peninsula of solid rock jutting out into the bay below the Statue of Liberty. For hours after the explosion no one could approach within miles of it to ascertain the exact damage. . It may safely be assumed, however, that no one on the whole peninsula escaped alive. Black Tom is used as a freight yard by the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

> For a wide radius about the neck of the peninsula great damage was done. Fortunately it is not a residential district or the loss of life undoubtedly would have been staggering. The force of the explosion may be estimated from the fact that all over Manhattan windows were broken and persons were startled from their beds by the terrific shock.

> Through the business district of lower Manhattan the streets were littered with broken glass. The police of the region were quite inadequate in number to protect the goods thus left exposed to theft, particularly the millions in gems in the Maiden lane district. Calls were sent to Police Headquarters and men detailed to duty in the street car strike were hurriedly despatched to guard property downtown.

> At 2:45 another terrific shock occurred, lasting several seconds and again rocking buildings in Manhattan upon their foundations. The flames had reached another ammunition car. By this time the Fire Department of New York was being despatched by ferry to aid the Jersey departments in coping with the conflagration.

The fire had already directed attention toward Black Tom when the first explosion occurred.
